After taking some practice MCAT psychology/sociology, I have to admit to being about 9/10ths furious about the section. About 80-90% of the questions have the word "theory" in it, and amount to nothing more than a bunch of memorization of theory names/originators (e.g. give a situation, then ask which of four theories describe it).

MCAT psychology/sociology section = a missed opportunity ...

The MCAT is first and foremost a test of critical reasoning skills. Knowing how to use psychology and sociology information to interpret and solve complex problems is the key to a great MCAT score. However, without the foundational content, it is just as difficult to do well on the MCAT.

I learned that the new MCAT would incorporate sociology back in 2011. I was thrilled! At the time, I had been teaching social sciences to health majors for 6 years, and the news stoked fantasies of the future: maybe this was the beginning of a movement to revamp medical school curricula across the country (or world?) and foster fleets of culturally aware health care providers.
